

THE HEARTH TAX OF 1662 IN MERIONETH

The Hearth Tax of 1662 forms an interesting chapter in the chequered financial history of Charles II's reign. In its task of settling the national revenue the Restoration Parliament was faced with the fact that the sources of wealth for the maintenance of the crown and its dignity had become seriously impoverished. Many ancient feudal dues, such as wardship and marriage, had disappeared. Much of the ancient royal demesue had been alienated during the previous half century—in 1663 this was only valued at £100,000. For these and other reasons it was necessary to establish other sources of revenue for the "better support" of the sovereign, and it is in the light of this need that the greatly maligned financial policy of Charles is to be explained.

In 1661<sup>1</sup> parliament granted the sovereign a perpetual excise on ale and beer to raise an yearly income of £1,200,000, but as the estimates of the yield of this tax were faulty supplementary additional taxes had to be imposed. Among these was the Hearth Tax of 1662<sup>2</sup> which levied a tax of two shillings per annum, to be paid in equal instalments half yearly, on all "hearths, and stoves, in all the houses, edifices, lodgings and chambers" in the country, except these of the very poorest. It is not the purpose of these notes to trace in detail the story of the operation of the Act until it was repealed in 1688,<sup>3</sup> and was replaced by the tax on windows. At first it was collected by the constables and its proceeds remitted directly to the Treasury as part of the sheriff's accounts. But within two years the tax collection was placed as security for loans from the City of London, and the collectors were instructed to pay the proceeds to the city chamberlain. In 1666 the tax was farmed out, and though the Treasury had to resume control in 1668 because of the opposition to the tax and the inexperience of the fermors, it was farmed out again in 1674 and 1675. The policy of farming out the tax put its collection in the hands of strangers, and these "chimney men" with their powers to enter homes for the purpose of assessing the tax added to the bitter hatred of the tax itself.<sup>4</sup> In the words of the repealing act it was regarded as "a great oppression to the poorer sort", and "a badge of slavery upon the whole people". The collectors books for some of the counties have such comments as "damb'd up" and "pulled down" in their margins indicating some of the methods used to escape payment; in England at least there was rioting against the act in many places and when popular hatred rose to its height against "chimney money" in 1666—1667 the government had to take special steps to deal with it.

Among the Lay Subsidy Rolls at the Public Record Office two documents are available dealing with the tax in Merioneth. One consists of a number of lists compiled by the petty and high constables of the various hundreds and townships and is dated 1662.<sup>5</sup> The other,<sup>6</sup> which is undated, consists of a book of forty one pages, the origin and purpose of which is given in a note on its last page—"This is a true copy of the bookes delivered to Mr Morgan to collect and receive for the County of Merioneth".

It is clear from the anglicisation of the names of the householders that this book is the work of a stranger collector concerned with implementing the Act.

Notwithstanding the fact that it is faded and dilapidated in places the first document, which is reproduced here, is the more important of the two for the history of the county. The preamble to the lists indicates that they are the original lists compiled by the local officers and which were enrolled by the justices, thus forming the basis for the collection. The document is in the form of seventeen membranes of varying lengths. Each membrane, apart from the second, which is a certificate from the justices that the work has been done and is too faded for transcribing, is the list submitted by the petty or high constable for his area and duly signed by him. The justices in turn added their signature on the first side of the membrane, though these signatures are missing from some because of the dilapidation of the membrane.

The lists have been reproduced in the order in which they are tied together, and it will be seen that some of them have been misplaced; for instance two of the Penllyn lists (membranes 7 and 8) have become detached from those of the rest of the hundred; similarly the Ardudwy lists have become separated. It will be seen also that the lists for Ystumanner are missing and also those for Llanbedr, Llanfihangel, Llanfrothen and Llanaber in Ardudwy<sup>7</sup>. The first list, for Llanfor and Penmaen, has been transcribed exactly as it stands as an example of the form in which the constables made their returns; but the other lists have been rearranged according to the number of hearths for the sake of economy of space. The total figures given for each list are in a different hand to the list itself and is, presumably, that of one of the justices or the sheriff's officer. Names have not been modernized and the few abbreviations used have been retained.

Local historians will regret the absence of the names of the holdings from so many of the lists. Even so, the list of householders alone will serve as valuable corroboration in other fields of local study, particularly where parish registers are not available. For the county historian, the document is a welcome addition to our sources for administrative and social history in a period when other sources are meagre and when county archives have been lost. He also will have one regret, that the lists throw such little light on the vexed question of pauperism in the county at the time;<sup>8</sup> the only reference contained in them will be found in Llandderfel. Notwithstanding this, it provides numerous points of departure for county history in the seventeenth century. Only one of them can be mentioned in this short introduction. These lists provide the only picture we have of the incidence and distribution of population in the county at a time when the agrarian changes of the Tudor and the Elizabethan age had reached a stage of equilibrium and before the silent expansion of the eighteenth century came in.
